What are Sarah Sprinkel's plans for Winter Park?

Her campaign mailers don't tell voters, but her campaign finance records reveal the real story.

Sprinkel is funded by the most notorious developers in Winter Park. They need her on the Commission to change our development rules.

- Sprinkel's backers have given her nearly $50,000. They include many of the developers who tried to build the giant Carlisle condo complex next to Central Park, before residents stopped it.
- Sprinkel could revive the Carlisle project simply by eliminating protections of our Comprehensive Growth Plan. In a chilling Dec. 14, 2010 email to funders, developer David Lamm wrote: "Steve and Sarah have similar approaches and mindsets... as you know, we came close last year."

Sprinkel does not really believe in preserving Winter Park's character. She subdivided her own historic home site to the head Carlisle developer.

- Sprinkel split her Gamble Rogers home site in in 1981, selling half of it to head Carlisle developer Allan Keen. He built a large house that blocks neighbors' lake views. This is not preserving history. Commissioners should stop developers seeking easements to build parking garages next to residences.
- Sprinkel has re-mortgaged her house ten times since 1977, at an astonishing average rate of once every 3.6 years. Commissioners cannot re-finance city property to balance the budget. The developers backing Sprinkel have already cost taxpayers $3.7 million from our City reserves.

Sprinkel was a taxpayer-funded lobbyist, paid to influence other taxpayer-funded officials. She is a politician and a county operative.

- If Sprinkel became a commissioner, she would have to negotiate public employee pension contracts, while remaining eligible for her own public employee pension. She pushes for City funding of regional and county projects, and would lower our standards for making important decisions.
- Sprinkel's career in "public administration and government relations" includes a highly-paid county lobbyist position and seats on at least 66 regional boards, but none in Winter Park.
